Family Discipleship

by Tim Tripp

When I was a kid, soccer wasn't even a 'real' sport in the United States. I remember it being talked about with cricket and rugby as games that were played elsewhere but were regarded by most Americans as uninteresting at best and stupid at worst. My friends and I played a lot of back yard football and we looked at soccer as a game fit for the less masculine (that's putting it kindly, as you can imagine). We watched some of the highlights from the World Cup games and made fun of the guys who appeared to fling themselves to the ground at the slightest touch and lay there writhing in pain in what often seemed to be faking an injury. As football players we had little respect for that. We were more likely to pretend not to be injured. If you got a bloody nose or mouth you wiped the blood off on the sleeve of your shirt and kept going. Soccer, in our view would always be something they played somewhere else.

When my kids were growing up however, it became evident that soccer was coming on as a real sport in America. Parents were putting their kids into soccer camps and soccer leagues were fast becoming big business. The term "soccer mom" was coined describing moms (parents) who were passionate about the sport and enthusiastically supported their kids in it. In 1993, Major League Soccer (MLS) was born and demonstrated that US support for soccer was legit. Parents who were serious about the sport and their kids playing in it, hired coaches for personal lessons and put their kids in leagues at as early as 3 years of age. In fact, most adults who are experts at the sport and play at a high level now were kicking a soccer ball around in the living room with mom and/or dad when they were in diapers. It might be said that parents who are interested in their kids excelling at soccer will introduce them very young, instruct them at home, have them playing early, hire a coach for private lessons and make sacrifices for them to work their way up in league play to gain the skills it will take to play at the highest level.

So, what does that look like for spiritual pursuits? If the goal for our children is to develop a faith that is their own and grow to a place where they are on fire for the Lord as adults and seek to be disciples who make disciples, how does the soccer model above instruct that? Is it possible to develop a regimen of faith training at home and work on it every day? Is it possible to engage children in spiritual coaching (disciple making) starting at a very young age? Of course it is!

The problem with our current model of spiritual formation for our kids is that it is centered around what happens at church. They may get an hour or two of Bible classes a week and sit through worship services that are not geared for someone their age. It's a good thing but not enough. In Deuteronomy chapter six, God instructed parents to do spiritual training daily. I would guess he expects no less now. There must be an intentional regimen, a planned agenda at home for kids to go through on a daily basis to take faith to a higher level. Parents, if you want your kids' faith to be at a high level, its up to you to get them there.

Every Day Counts!

19,710 days ago, I was born on this earth. About 2,555 of those days, my life was pure and innocent. After that, I spend about 5,110 days of my life in impure and sinful ways. 5, 110 days of living for myself, not taking into consideration at all, the sacrifice of the Son of God, Jesus Christ! After 7,700 days, I learned about how I wasted so many days of my life doing for the flesh. Not pleasing God but pleasing my ego, my desires, my sinful nature. Since then, 12,045 days, I have lived a new life, a second chance to glorify God and to please him. Now, every day is another opportunity to live the day for the Lord. So, my question to you is: how many days of your life have you served the Lord? How many days of your life has passed not serving the Lord? Every day counts!!! And for you and me... the last day of our life in this earth is coming! Let us use the days that God is giving us, to do His Will, to glorify His Name and to serve Him always. Blessings to you my West Side family!

Love. Share. Disciple.

WSYM returned Sunday night from a wonderful trip to Branson, hope you liked the photos on social media. Communication about events and gatherings in this age can give us mixed emotions on how things are going in a particular group. We use the internet as a way of staying connected when we physically can't make it together. Let me encourage you to not make the internet our only means of connection. Come and 'Be Here, Be Active and Be Engaged' in what WSYM has to offer.
