Emergence

by Tim Tripp

I know that many have been wondering lately about what things will look like once we emerge from this health crisis. It certainly was not something we asked for or wanted. Against our will it changed us all in some ways. While we look forward to the end of "social distancing," face masks and frequent hand sanitizing, there is little doubt that the atmosphere of stores, restaurants and gathering places will be more sterile and a little less cozy moving forward.

Hopefully, we will be like the butterfly in the days ahead that emerges from the cocoon seeing that things have changed but mostly for the better. And we hope not to be like the salmon who is compelled by nature to swim upstream to discover the point of his mandatory journey only to find that his best days were behind him.

I think the difference between whether our emergence is like the butterfly or the salmon is intentionality. Like the butterfly to the cocoon and the salmon to the stream, we had no choice but to go through an unpleasant journey but unlike them, we can choose the attitude by which we emerge from these circumstances. Will our attitude be about discovering the beauty that we find in the newness of our surroundings or will we be focused on all that has changed, all that we miss and the way things were before? If a high value is placed on getting back to what was, we could very easily miss the beauty and the gain of what is.

The Israelites emerged from captivity after 70 years to begin rebuilding their city and their culture. Nehemiah and Ezra led groups from Babylon back to Jerusalem to restore their city, their religion and their way of life. There were a few among them who were children when they left the old Jerusalem and older adults when they returned. When these saw the temple that was rebuilt they wept because they remembered the old one and how glorious was the temple Solomon had built. The new one could not compare. However, those who had grown up only knowing captivity rejoiced because they, for the first time, could worship God in a place they called their own. To them, this new temple was the most beautiful thing they had ever seen because in it, they were free to worship God and experience his presence, (Ezra 3:7-13).

There we see both attitudes. Those who only focused on what was lost, seeing a more meager, bleaker picture versus those who saw the beauty in the new and rejoiced in what stood before them.

While it is normal to grieve what has been lost, it is not healthy to long dwell in it. Grief heals the emotional wounds caused by loss allowing perspectives to evolve from a bleak colorless world to one filled again with color and beauty.

Perhaps the attitude to strive for is one that is intentional about seeing beauty in what is new. Think butterfly not fish. Be determined to grieve what is gone but look for the good in what has replaced it. Embrace the opportunities God gives us to grow in soil that is renewed and look for opportunities to serve him in it.

Remember that while some things might have changed when we emerge, the mission of the church has not and will not change. We still have as our objective to take God's kingdom to the world no matter what that world we emerge into looks like.

Pray that God helps us find the beauty in the new.

Dios Le Bendiga! (God Bless You!)

by Aris Ortiz

Blessings to you my West Side family!

Our "new" normal continues and little by little we have accepted doing things the way we were not so used to doing them and even sometimes, we will be called "exaggerated" but now, we feel we need to do it.

This reminds me of my "before and after" of being a Christian. So many things that I used to do and say, that when I became a Christian, my way of life changed a lot. I needed to watch my mouth, on what to say and how. I was more aware of how others were conducting themselves and always looking to avoid and not to do something that will "contaminate" my soul in order not to get sick (spiritually); not going to those places where I will expose myself and be at risk of getting a habit that will affect me and take me to death for eternity. But finding the shot and the medicine for my salvation in Christ, I have survived and I'm still fighting the good battle keeping the faith until I reach that crown that has been prepared for me and for all those who love the Lord and keep his commandments but I need to keep myself faithful every day. Let's keep fighting the good fight my West Side family and the Lord will fight for us!!! More blessings to you family of the faith !!!
